

Design choices:

In my sitemap digital mockup, the template already had a secondary list under the first box on the very left, and being new to Creately, the program I used to make it, I designed around it instead of trying to figure out how to put the secondary list elsewhere. My sketch draft was very minimal, so this didn't affect my format in a negative way.

The order of importance I used is left-to-right, with examples of my work as the most important to viewers. Next is my resumé as a more concise version of my past work and experiences, and third is a gallery of all the visual pieces I've done in case the viewer would rather get a quick browse than read, a foil to the resumé of only reading. Finally, I have any extra information about myself and external links to my email, blogs, and other sites that somehow involve me on the far right, a directory to my work at the end of my portfolio tour.

My navigation is inherently simple: there's a home page with some titles of pages and accompanying images on it, and you click them to get to the page. There'll be a navigation bar so that the viewer can go to any other page from where they are. It'll be mostly pictures, as I'm a visual person and do visual things.